HOW'S IT MADE

Natural building stone is produced by quarrying large blocks of stone from deposits in the earth, typically using saws, drills, and controlled blasting.

The blocks are then transported to a processing facility, where they're cut to specific dimensions using gang saws, bridge saws, wire saws or guillotines. After cutting, the pieces are shaped, trimmed, and finished — often by splitting, tumbling, honing, or polishing — depending on the desired texture and appearance.

Finally, the stone is sorted by color, size, and quality before being palletized for shipment. Each step balances efficiency with preserving the natural character that makes every stone unique.

LURVEY PRO TIP

Creating a mockup is an essential step, installing natural stone veneer is an art. Every mason has a unique approach to shaping and fitting pieces, and the mockup ensures alignment on the desired look before installation begins. It's the perfect opportunity to review color blend, stone layout, joint spacing, and mortar finish—all details that dramatically influence the final appearance. A well-built mockup ensures the finished project reflects the design, vision, and craftsmanship intended.
